"My home is too much for me. I don't care to cook, and most of all I don't like eating alone. My family's busy and they come if I call, but I don't like to bother them. Can anyone help me?"

"My parents can no longer live without some assistance. I want to help them safely stay in their home. If necessary, I need to move them to a place with the services they need. Is there anyone who would assist in assessing their needs and help us choose in-home support services or give us information about assisted living or nursing home facilities? I've read some information from the Internet and other brochures, but I'm still confused how to proceed. Can anyone help?"

If you've ever had a question like this, or for a friend or family member, you're not alone. Nearly 7 million Americans will be asking these questions. Unfortunately, there is not a crystal ball to help us find the answers.

Let's face it, life is all about change. Some we face willingly and some changes come when we least expect it. Change is especially difficult if you are not aware of resources that might make your life much simpler. Best Care Guide opens the door to many resources – some new and some that you were aware of but may not have thought could help.

Providing the best senior care requires an extraordinarily large base of information – everything from internal medicine to pharmacology and dermatology, to rehabilitative medicine. However, it also requires a different approach to care than many other areas of medical practice. This approach coordinates care among physicians, nurses, social workers, therapists, pharmacists, and a myriad of other health professionals. Care also requires education. Therefore, we have attempted to bring together a group of professionals that understand the optimal approach.
